Rose, the pink fairy, was thousands of years old,
and she was getting tired of granting wishes.

She had some outdated ideas
and children kept asking for wishes she didn't want to grant.

Will she be able to make the children happy again?

And will she ever find her own happiness?

Winner of the VIII International Narrating Equality Children's Book Award

A Different Kind of Fairy received the International Narrating Equality Children's Book Award which celebrates its 8th Edition.

The award was created by the Italian Association Woman to be in order to promote equality and diversity and challenge stereotypes in literature.

To all the fairy godmothers who have guided and continue to guide me.

ROSE, THE PINK FAIRY,
was thousands of years old,
and she'd been granting wishes for just as long.

“Hello there, pretty little girl. I’m Rose the fairy, and I’ve come to grant you a wish!”

But lately, Rose had been acting quite odd.

“Really? Then I wish to be a RUGBY PLAYER!”

“But, but... Goodness me!”
said the pink fairy.
“GIRLS DON'T PLAY RUGBY!”

The little girl stood there in awe.
And without another word,
the pink fairy flew off,
muttering to herself under her breath as she went.

The next day,
the pink fairy
decided to try again.

“Great! I wish to be a DANCER!”

“Hello there, handsome little boy. I’m Rose the fairy, and I’ve come to grant you a wish!”

said the pink fairy.
“BOYS CAN'T BE DANCERS!”

The boy started to sob.

And with no explanation given,
perhaps because she didn't really have one, the pink fairy flew off, leaving the boy confused and sad.

Nobody could make the pink fairy SEE REASON.
Not even her best fairy friends.
